

The unexamined life is not worth living.
-Socrates

For your very first writing assignment, be reflective, examine your life, and answer these two questions:

- Who have you been?
- Who would you like to be?

You might consider experiences you've had, accomplishments, failures or faults, joys and sorrows. Then imagine the life you long for, the one you think about when your head hits the pillow at night, the one where you meet the world just as you have dreamed it. Don't be afraid to reach for the stars.

Give each question a paragraph, and before you ask how long it should be, I will simply share the wisdom from this Polish proverb: "Words must be weighed, not counted." That means the content of your writing should dictate its length, nothing more and nothing less. (Although, for our purposes on this first day, about 1 typed or handwritten page ought to do the trick!)

Due: Day 2
30 Points

The unexamined life is not worth living.
-Socrates

For your very first writing assignment, be reflective, examine your life, and answer these two questions:

- Who have you been?
- Who would you like to be?

You might consider experiences you've had, accomplishments, failures or faults, joys and sorrows. Then imagine the life you long for, the one you think about when your head hits the pillow at night, the one where you meet the world just as you have dreamed it. Don't be afraid to reach for the stars.

Give each question a paragraph, and before you ask how long it should be, I will simply share the wisdom from this Polish proverb: "Words must be weighed, not counted." That means the content of your writing should dictate its length, nothing more and nothing less. (Although, for our purposes on this first day, about one typed page ought to do the trick!)

Due: Day 2
30 Points